Hookers, Hooters and All Sorts of Long-Legged, Big Busty Women Unite in Lawn Care

No, it does not sound farfetched! In these dark times of financial recession and nearing depression, why can't young, tall, sexy women find honest-to-goodness monetary progression? Since lay-offs are experienced in all sectors of the economy, entrepreneurs are rising up from very, very, strange places. Due to fewer takers, what's a prostitute to do? Since the look n' lust restaurant trade is down, there is less hootin' going on. Plus, plain old, everyday, run of the mill, attractive women, are being "let go" as office staffs are reduced.

So, what do high-heels, long legs and bouncy, abundant breasts all have in common – besides attracting men's stares? Well, men also own lawns – that's what!

Depending upon the quality of your soil and yard care, aeration is certainly a beneficial procedure. Aeration is a method of creating a multitude of three inch deep, half-inch wide holes into a lawn in order to get needed air and water farther into the soil. This has typically been accomplished by using a man-operated, earth pounding, motorized machine. Its tell-tale sign of completion is the immediate misperception of onlookers that a squadron of small dogs have furiously pooped on every square foot of the yard and then moved on.

That yard care machine is about to have stiff, yet very flexible competition from out of work ladies.

Imagine this, that is, unless you have already seen the ladies in action. A pink van pulls up, out pile some of the best looking, young women a man could hope for – usually half a dozen per crew. All are wearing hot pink. They are dressed, well really, dressed as only a warm sunny day requires. Each applies suntan lotion, in a slow and sensual way. Then they strap on what appears to be a special high-heeled, glittering, eyeball-smacking pair of shoes.

What the women are putting their feet and painted toe nails into are, in fact, recently patented, hollow-heeled aerating shoes. At the end of those long, slender, perfect pairs of legs, are the women's new means of making a living by manual labor.

The clever design has a sharp circular entry, which receives the soil when sufficient pressure is applied from the jiggling female up above. As the heel is raised a cylinder of soil neatly drops out. The simple procedure is repeated, alternating left and right feet, until the job is done.

For too many of their male customers, the time it takes to aerate an entire lawn is all too brief. In fact, the only customers they have are men. Typically, they are single, separated, divorced or if married, they have their wife's schedule down pat. No husband would want to even try and explain to his beloved why there were six bikini dancers on their front yard and he in a lawn chair dutifully supervising!

Though the work will be seasonal in some states, for now, both the paycheck and the workout are not the only things looking good.
